Science Increasingly Makes the Case for God
The odds of life existing on another planet grow ever longer. Intelligent design, anyone?

The more we get to know about our universe, the more the hypothesis that there is a Creator gains in credibility as the best explanation of why we are here.

Professor of Mathematics
Sagan’s only two “criteria” for a planet to support life were: 1. The Right Kind of Star and 2. A Planet the Right distance from that Star.
200+ known parameters necessary for a planet to support life, every single one of which must be perfectly met.
The parameter that Eric Metaxas exemplifies is that of the importance of Jupiter as the shield protecting earth from the big impacts of comets.
To have randomly all of these >200 needed factors for the existence of life on the earth is equivalent to the impossibility of obtaining the same face of the coin some ‘10 with 18 zeros’ times.
The odds against life in the universe are astonishing.
talking about existing a life-sustaining Earth just happened to beat the inconceivable odds?
Values of the four fundamental forces

1. Gravity
2. Electromagnetic
3. Strong Nuclear
4. Weak Nuclear

were determined less than 1,000,000th of a second after The Beginning! [That Hoyle calls: The ‘Big Bang’]
Each of these forces has to keep a precise balance with the other because even with the slightest variation the Universe couldn’t have existed; i.e.: The Strong Nuclear Force has to keep a precise ratio in relation to the Electromagnetic Force for the Universe to exist at all.
At what point is it fair to admit that it is science itself that suggests that we cannot be the result of random forces?
Certainly, science studied objectively leads to GOD!

Recently, the ESA Mars Express found a frozen fresh water lake in a enormous crater at Mars' north pole!! It has been proven that this gigantic marsian lake might have preserved primitive life. The frozen lake measures about 800 by 900 kilometers!!
In 2007, astronomers and scientists found in a planet far, far away from our Solar System, about 63 light-years away, water vapor!! This gas water was found in a planet orbiting another star. This planet is called a “hot Jupiter” because it is a gas giant, just like the planet Jupiter in our Solar System.

In 2004, Scientists found evidence that cold, Yellowstone-like geysers of water are active in a moon of Saturn called Enceladus.

A Taste for Comet Water

When Comet LINEAR broke apart last year it revealed what many scientists thought all along: water in Earth's oceans could have come from outer space.

May 18, 2001 -- Last year comet C/1999 S4 (better known as "Comet LINEAR") surprised astronomers by breaking apart as it passed near the Sun. Now the long-dead comet has surprised them again: New research shows Comet LINEAR was likely made up of water with the same isotopic composition as water found here on Earth. The finding supports a controversial idea that cometary impacts billions of years ago could have provided most of the water in Earth's oceans.
Comets born near Jupiter are rare today because the giant planet’s gravity long ago flung most of them into interstellar space. Nevertheless, they would have been numerous during the solar system’s formative years. Astronomers think the primordial Earth would have intercepted more comets from the "Jupiter zone" (which is comparatively poor in heavy water) than ones that formed in the outer solar system (which is rich in heavy water).

The "Jupiter zone" received more light and was warmer than the outer solar system. As a result, more reactions occurred in the gas near Jupiter and greater amounts of many complex organic molecules were available to wind up in comets. Also, Jupiter’s powerful gravity kept collision speeds between comets near it high, preventing them from growing very large. Both factors may have given a boost to life on Earth.

Right: Comets born near Jupiter may contain the right flavor of water to explain Earth’s oceans.

Editor's Note: In 1999 cosmochemist Geoff Blake and colleagues at Caltech showed that Comet Hale-Bopp contained too much heavy water to match Earth's oceans. Those findings triggered widespread reports that comets couldn’t be a source of terrestrial water. Now Comet LINEAR has shown us that Earth’s oceans could hail from comets after all. But do they? Comets aren’t the only candidate water sources for Earth. Our oceans may have been delivered by asteroids (another controversial idea) or perhaps water was caught up in the body of Earth as it formed and later released by volcanic outgassing (as many of us learned in school). Or all of the above! The origin of Earth’s oceans remains a mystery, a topic for continued research.

Polar Predator

At roughly 7 metres long, Nanuqsaurus – the first tyrannosaur discovered near either pole – is dwarfed by its cousins Tyrannosaurus rex and Albertosaurus.

New, scaled-down Tyrannosaur found in Alaska

- This smaller version of the species was adapted to the different environment.
- Experts say the skull remains are of a new species of the predator.
- Tyrannosaurus remains are normally found in the low- to mid-altitudes of North America or Central Asia.
- Skull reconstructed from just 4 fragments.

Notable specimens [edit]

Oilsands ankylosaurian [edit]

A complete ankylosaurian skeleton was discovered by accident on March 21, 2011 in approximately 110 million-year-old rock being excavated at the Suncor Millenium oilsands mine near Fort McMurray, Alberta, Canada. It is the oldest complete dinosaur specimen from the province.[11] The fossil was found in the Wabiskaw Member of the Clearwater Formation, a marine deposit, and represents a terrestrial animal that became entombed in the sea floor approximately 200 kilometres (120 mi) from the nearest known paleo-shoreline. The specimen experienced no postmortem disruption, with all the bones, including phalanges, in three-dimensional articulation. All the dermal armour appeared to be undisturbed and present. There are large areas with impressions of scales with alternating diamond and hexagonal shapes. There is also a large cluster of unusual pisolith-like bodies (up to 2 cm in diameter) in the gut region that may represent stomach contents. Preparation of the specimen, which appears to be a nodosaur, began in April 2011 at the Royal Tyrrell Museum of Paleontology and is expected to take several years.[12][13]
And God said, Let there be light [a light different than the light of the sun and the stars]: and there was light.
And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament Heavens. And the evening and the morning were the second day.
